meeting at Lauro in Rainulf's own fief of AvelHno.
Rainulf knelt and kissed the King's feet; Roger raised him up and embraced him among the tears of the bystanders. But there was no weak generosity in the victor; though he restored his late foe to all his fiefs he exacted from the Count's vassals an oath akin to that of Salisbury, by which, should their lord revolt once more against the King, they should give him a period of forty days in which they should strive to bring him to his allegiance; if they failed then they must make war upon him with all their might.
The royal then moved north, The King Capua and Robert a landless refugee; Rolpoto at Benevento had already taken his flight to Naples and from Naples to Pisa, finally meeting an obscure death on the road by drowning; Crescentius re-entered the city in June, of Naples had played consistently, if not actively, the part of an ally to Robert and Rainulf.
He now came in to Roger at Capua, knelt before him, placed his hands between those of the King, and swore homage and fealty to him, It was this time a true feudal submission on the part of the Mililum; hii city only was left to him; of the duchy the outlying territories

had been aaci by Roger.*
The or submission of all the was now complete, They had their revolt .at sworn of